HONGKONG, WEDNESDAY, JULY 16, 1890. Ir is well that the discussion of the meaning and scope of the Fraudulent Trade Marks Bill should take place before the Bill becomes law. It too often happens in this yond, vid Marscilles; to Saigon, Straits Colony that the true import of the provisions of an ordinance are discovered years | that he gets a superfine article, and if he after the law has been or is supposed to does not be must suffer. And manufachave been in operation. The discussion turers in England must not fold their arms at the meeting on Monday showed that and expect the law to do everything in the most of the members had only a hazy idea way of establishing the value of their goods: of what was likely to be the result in practice of the measure they were discussing. On the one side there were the unofficial memhers, who may be supposed to know commercial usages but who know little about English and French Packets, when they practical law, and on the other side there was the Attorney General, who is supposed to know the law, but who does not, we imagine, pretend to have a large knowledge of commercial usages. Between them, the parties managed to make the meaning of the Bill more obscure than it really is. The principal blame for this result lies at the door of the Acting Attorney General. A plain, simple question was put to him by Mr MacEwen. 11.10 A.M.) with 10 cents late fee up to Would goods bearing such English words 11.30 a.m., after which hour they may as Superfine cloth, if manufactured in Germany, require to have on them words stating that they were manufactured in Germany, in order to escape the ponalties of the Ordinance " Mr Ackroyd-for whom the excuse must of course be made that he only took over the Attorney Generalship a few days before-not knowing the Bill he was introducing, gave a very confusing and most misleading reply to the question. He based his reply on Section 14. Now, that section has absolutely nothing to do with the question put by Ma MacEwen. In the ordinance there is a very broad distinction drawn between trade marks and trade descriptions. Had this distinction been clearly pointed cut, a great deal of confusion would have been avoided. Mr Ackroyd evilently did not see the difference himself, and he kept on quoting clause I of Section The s. s. Alberta, from Liverprol, left Bin-14, as if it allowied a satisfactory solution to the question put to him. Section 14, The P. & O. Co. a extra elemer Thibet however, says nothing about trade descriptions. It deals solely and entirely with trade marks and with personal names. It sets forth that 'all goods of foreign manus vestment Company have raised the rate of facture bearing any pame or tradesmark; the Luceim Dividend advertised yesterday being or purporting to be the name or from 8 to 10 per cent. per anomo. trade mark of any nightly ciprer, dealer, or trader in the United Kingdom' &c. Now the veriest simpleton might know that the words 'superfine cloth do not come within ment he was talking nonsense. The words superline cloth do not necessarily form a trade mark, but they constitute a trade description as clearly as any words can. Section 3 says, 'The expression "trade description" means any description, statement, or other indication, direct or indirect, as to the material of which any goods are composed. If Mr Ackroyd is prepared to say that the words superfine cloth give no indication, direct or indirect, of the material of which the goods are composed, we shall expect to hear him argue at next meeting that two and two are five.

Butthegreatquestion remains, would these words, on goods from Germany bearing no other mark, form a false trade description within the meaning of the Ordinance. The expression false trade description is defined to mean a trade description which is false in material respects as regards the goods to which it is applied. With this bodying all the latest improvements in definition we must also couple the one which states that a trade description is any indication direct or indirect sa to the appliances for ensuring purity in the place or country in which any goods were made or produced. If the words superwith 3,000 gallons of distilled water a day, fine cloth are an indication direct or indiand are now in a position to compete in rect that the cloth is made in England, then if the cloth is made in Germany, and words to that effect are not added, the person who applies such a description or sells such goods is liable to punishment. But do the words superfine cloth indicate English make? Mr Francis says English words on goods are a very fair indication of nationality and have been held to be so. He does not quote his authority, and we have not the text of any decision on the point; but it must be plain to every one that such a principle cannot have a general application. The words superfine cloth, for example, might equally well indicate American goods as English goods. The United Kingdom is not the only country that uses the English language. And in the case of goods known to come from Germany or any country whose official language is not English, it would, we think, be a very difficult thing to prove in Hongkong that English words per se are a false indication as to the place or country in which the goods were made. The decision of the Court would depend on the nature of the words and the usages of the trade. All that the law forbids is a misleading indication, and we do not suppose more can be said. Each case would have to be determined en its own merits. If something more definite than this is wanted a clause will have to be inserted forbidding the use of English words on foreign goods, and even that will not guard us from American imposition. But is such a regulation becausey? The law clearly forbids the importation of goods with forged trade marks, and of fereign goods bearing the name of any manufacturer, dealer or trader in the United Kingdom, and it punishes the use of the name of a place or country calculated to mislead as to the origin of the goods. If it protects merchants to this extent, we think they may reasonably be saked to do the rest themselves. There is a limit to grandmotherly government. A man who buys superine cloth, ought to take reasonable care to ascertain STANLEY'S company, whose long, and, on the whole, very successful visit to the colony is now drawing to a close, put the well-known modern comedy The Private Secretary on the boards last night, before a fair large audience. It would be going considerably wide of the mark to say that the performance was as near perfection as one could have wished, but the piece was tolerably well played and afforded a good desi of ampagment. The measure of success that was attained was due chiefly to Mr Pyne's impersonation of the Rev. Robert Spalding. Mr Pyne thoroughly identified himself with his part, as he generally does, and while making as much as he possibly could out of it, exercised a prais worthy. degree of self-restraint in refraining from exaggeration. There is nothing new in the to cos's. arguments he sets forth. They are interesting principally because they are used by a Frenchman. We are told that Tong-King was conquered at great expense, because it is the gate to southern China, and the writer then animadverts on the policy of the French Government in attempting to exclude from the colony all but French goods. The attempt, be says, is a failure. The people want Chinese and Indian goods, and, in spite of tariffe, China and India continue There is one other observation, he makes which our readers will be interested in, and that is with regard to boundaries. He looks forward to a regulation of boundaries with England between Burmah and Tong-King, and urges that the French should make up their minds how far to the west their claims will extend. This, perhaps, is looking a little too far ahead. However, it is interesting to find a Frenchman discussing Tong-King affairs in this way, whatever may be the value attached to his words. - London & China Express.

THE FOREIGN CUSTOMS AND To the Editor of the 'CHINA MAIL'

Canton, July 15, 189). Sm, In your issue of 12th instant, you state in your leading article that it would be desirable if the Foreign Customs were anthorized to collect Lokin together with the import duty, but that the Foreign Cus toms has refused to do so on account o being uncertain that further taxes would not be enforced in the interior. I am able to state that, having imported certain merchandise from Hongkong, having paid the import duty thereon according to tariff and having subsequently taken out a transit pass according to Treaty, before shipping the goods to the port of destination a further tax was demanded by the Hopno himself (who had already guaranteed the passage of the goods to the port of destina tion free of further tax); and that, in order to make use of the Transit pass, the tax demanded, had to be paid to the official above mentioned, who had issued and ecaled the document in question. An application to the Foreign Quatoms afford d no relief, as they were unable or unwilling to interfere with the native official taxes. - I am, yours, MERCATOR.

The tax chaimed by the Hoppo in addition to the transit duty was a clear violation of the Treaty, and we should say that it was the British Consul and not the Foreign Customs to whom 'Mercator cught to have appealed. We admi that there is little inducement to fight such a battle single-handed. The Chineso like to eat their cide and have too-are quite willing to take transit duties collected by the Customs and then levy transit duties themselves: But are we not a little to blame for allowing them to do as they like? Nothing can be obtained from the Chinese without a struggle; and if a bold stand, even under existing circumstances, were made by the foreign Consuls and Ministers, backed up the Chambers of Commerce, the Chinese authorities might be compelled to recognise the passes, at any rate to the extent they are recognised in the North. As long. however, as the present half and half optional, indefinite arrangement continues, under which it is impossible to compel China to forbid the levy ing of in and taxes on foreign goods there will always be a great deal of friction. But if there was as clear an understanding as there is in the Opium Convention, that no inland taxes were to be collected; and if the advantage to China and the conditions attached were such as to make her auxious to carry out the agreement. we believe it would not be a difficult matter to break down all the inland barriers as far as the passage of foreign goods is concerned The Hoppo then would not have the shadow of a pretext for interfering in any way with foreign goods. Can Mercator give us instances of serious infringement of the Opium Convention? If not, we have experience in favour of our conten-

The girl got into the habit, whenever she visited her villago, of going to the house of this cousin, and not to that of her father. The cousin was absent much of the time, on his business in connection with the suppression (of the sale) of smuggled talt. Com one occasion, after a ten days visit to her native village. she re praced to the home of her husband (also a mere child), where she staid five days, and then went again to her own village. A younger sister in law, sixteen years of age, went with her twothirds of the way, at which point the bride sent her escort back and proceeded alone. Some days after this, the own sister of the bride met the father-in-law at a fair, and inquired why the bride did not return to her own village as agreed. Her absence from both homes was thus for the first time discovered. The steps taken to follow her are an execollent illustration of cortain phases of Chinese life. It is almost impossible in China for any one to do anything > ment would seem to be very slight. The father-in-law of the girl went to the village where she had lived, and learned that upon the occasion of ber home visits the child had been allowed to go where she pleased, and that once after coming in from her cousin's, she had been heard to remark that she herself was worth as much as five ounces of silver. It was also reported that the wife of the cousin had been observed he was last seen, at the time when she dismissed the sister-in-law who had accompanied her. This was all the clus that could be got.

The father-in law now presented a betition to the district magistrate, reciting the facts and accusing the girl's father, and others. This was followed by counter accusations from the father, the cousin, and his mother-in-law. The official reply to the complaint was an order to the local cunstable to find the girl. The constable was a wholly incompetent person, and could not have found ber if he had tried. A tecond petition to the magistrate was followed by the same reply. This signified that there was no hope from that official, who took no interest in the matter

This is so universal a deterrent in a quest of this sort as almost/ to bar all progress. Those who were interested in this particular case were led to recal another, which occurred many years before in a village immediately contiguous. where the wife of a man who was working for some one else was taken off (of course with her consent) while he was absent. In this instance, although the husband was able to ascertain to what village she had been taken, yet as it was a large one he

It is of course impossible to form any correct ides as to the extent to which the kidnapping of married women is carried through which glimpses may be had of regions beyond our ordinary vision. Such papers, in which such accounts often form acquaintance with the wider interests of the empire, these piquant personalities scent to many Chinese very entertaining. as items of a similar sort do to certain readers in Western lands. Such gossip is collected at the vamens, where many of the cases reported have already reached the stage of a prosecution, and others are quietly adjusted by peace-talkers. Similar information may also be obtained from occasional memorials printed in the Peking Gazette. It not seldom happens that these kid unpping cases lead to murder, and perlians to wholesale fighting, ending in many deaths, which renders it necessary for a Governor to report the facts and proceedings to Peking, From data of this sort one would infer that, as the proverb says, the crow is everywhere equally black."
